

Task A: Real Website Analysis

Website analyzed: avrora.kz (Aurora Fashion Gallery)

1. Meta information

The page uses `<!DOCTYPE html>` and `lang="ru"`. The `<head>` section contains `<meta charset="UTF-8">`, `<meta name="viewport" content="width=device-width, initial-scale=1">`, and a `<title>` tag ("Главная | Aurora fashion gallery"). Additional meta tags were also detected: `og:title`, `meta name="description"`, and `og:image`.

2. Semantic Structure

The page correctly uses a `<header>` element to wrap the top section of the site (logo, phone number, language switcher, search bar). It also uses a proper `<footer>` element at the bottom of the page, containing the newsletter subscription form, contact links, and secondary navigation (About us, Stores, Vacancies). This is a good practice: a `<footer>` tells browsers, search engines, and screen readers that this content is supplementary, which allows assistive technology to skip past it, and signals to search engines that it is not the main content.

However, the main navigation menu (`<ul class="topmenu">`) is not wrapped in a `<nav>` element - it sits directly inside a ``.

This is a missed opportunity for semantic structure, since this list is clearly the site's primary navigation.

3. Forms and Tables

The page contains no `<table>` elements at all.

Two forms were found: a newsletter subscription form in the footer (`id="footerForm"`) and a product return form inside a modal window (`id="modal_vozvrat"`). Neither form connects its `<label>` elements to their corresponding `<input>` elements using matching `id` and `for` attributes — the labels are plain text with no accessibility link to the fields they describe.

4. Hand-drawn Sketch

The sketch shows the page's structure: `html > head + body > header` (with header-top, search-wrap, and topmenu) `> main content` (slider, brand carousel, store information) `> footer` (with the subscription form, footer items, and the return form).

5. Structural Errors and How I Avoided Them

Error 1: The main navigation on avrora.kz is not wrapped in a `<nav>` element — the menu (`<ul class="topmenu">`) sits directly inside a ``. On my own pages (catalog.html and contacts.html), the navigation menu is correctly wrapped in `<nav>`, containing a list of links to all pages of the site (see the `<nav>` element right after `<header>` on both pages).

Error 2: The forms on avrora.kz do not connect `<label>` elements to their `<input>` fields via matching `id/for` attributes - for example, the "Ваше имя" label in the product return modal has no `for` attribute at all, which harms accessibility. On my own pages, every <label> is explicitly connected to its corresponding <input> using matching for="..." and id="..." pairs — for instance, in the reservation form on contacts.html, <label for="c-name"> is paired with <input id="c-name">, and the same pattern is used for every other field (email, phone, date, quantity, category, and the checkbox).

Error 3: Several large content sections on avrora.kz (e.g. div.footer-item) are wrapped in plain  elements instead of a semantic tag, even though they represent distinct, self-contained pieces of content. On my own pages, I used <section> and <article> for content blocks that have their own clear meaning - for example, "How to find us" and "Opening hours by day" on contacts.html, and "Product Categories" and "Price Examples" on catalog.html, are all wrapped in <section>. I reserved  only for the one case where no semantic tag fit (a small wrapper around contact links on contacts.html, and a technical note on catalog.html), and explained that choice in an HTML comment directly above each <

Task B: Written Reflection

1. What a Web Page is

HTML is a text file containing various tags, these tell the browser exactly what a specific page element is—such as a heading, paragraph, table, image, and so on. When we open a file (like contacts.html), the browser does not simply display the raw text exactly as we typed it; instead, it reads the code line by line and interprets each tag according to its function. For instance, the `<h1>` tag instructs the browser to display text as a large main heading, the `<table>` tag indicates that content should be arranged in rows and columns, and the `<img>` tag commands the browser to load and display an image rather than plain text. Tags such as `<nav>` or `<form>` perform a more complex task: they define the role of a specific part of the page rather than just its visual appearance. Essentially, the browser acts as a translator: it takes a standard text file filled with tags and transforms it into a structured, visual web page that the visitor sees on screen and interacts with. Without this processing by the browser, the HTML file would look like ordinary text with angle brackets scattered throughout.

2. Semantic Tags I Chose Over Div

- In the catalog.html file, I used the `<section>` tag instead of `` for the "Price Examples" block. I chose `<section>` because this part of the page constitutes a distinct thematic section (pricing information) with its own heading, rather than merely serving as a generic container for styling purposes.

- In the catalog.html file, I used the <article> tag for the "Main Categories" block. I selected <article> because this section contains a self-contained block of product information-including main categories and subcategories-that could stand alone independently of the rest of the content.
- In the contacts.html file, I used the <aside> tag for the "How to Get Here" block. I preferred it over the  tag because this information supplements the primary address details and provides a brief tip regarding the nearest public transport stop, without being part of the main content flow.

3. What Happens When the Form Is Submitted

When the "Submit reservation" button is clicked, the data is not actually transmitted anywhere because the form has an action="#" attribute and there is no real server yet-the backend will be added later in the course. The browser does, of course, validate the required form fields (thanks to the required attribute), but even if all fields are filled out correctly, submitting the form does not result in the booking data being saved or transmitted. The page simply stays put or reloads, and the booking itself is not created.

Catalog

What categories are available

The Instyle.zh2 catalog covers a mix of everyday clothing, including jackets, skirts, long-sleeves, and T-shirts, so there's usually something for both casual and slightly dressier looks. Beyond clothing, the store also carries accessories like caps and bags, which means you can put together a full outfit without needing to shop somewhere else. The assortment stays fairly compact, but it's varied enough that browsing through it doesn't take long.

How often the assortment is updated

New arrivals show up fairly regularly, and the easiest way to keep track of them is through the store's Instagram stories rather than this page alone. Since the store doesn't have its own website, Instagram is really where everything gets announced first — new pieces, restocks, and sales all appear there before anywhere else. Checking it every so often is the best way to catch something before it sells out.

What makes the store different

One detail that stands out right away is the ZH2 branding — it's on the hangers, the tags, pretty much everywhere, which gives the store a more put-together feel than a typical small shop. What we liked is that it's not trying to be everything at once: the selection is small but genuinely varied, mixing basic everyday pieces with accessories, so you can look through several categories without feeling overwhelmed.

What to check before ordering

Because the store is small, it's worth double-checking the price, size, and current availability of an item before deciding on it — stock can shift quickly, and something popular might already be gone by the time you decide. The simplest way to confirm all of this is to message the store on WhatsApp directly rather than relying only on what's shown here.
